"YOUNG IN HEART!"

THE hot summer sun came through the windows and awakened Marcia Ann. She opened her eyes to the small cottage room, enjoying the freedom and simple pattern of life she found awaiting her now with each new day.

First she sighed, then she laughed, and between the two she pulled herself up in a bicycle position and gave twenty imaginary turns towards the ceiling. When finished she ran to the dresser mirror to examine the status of her figure, looked searchingly at the willowy reflection, and sighed again.

Ten minutes later she had rapidly washed, combed, dressed, eaten and gone down to the inlet beach where she layed out her long, striped beach towel and stretched herself upon it. She was alone, and after a quick glance at the ocean she watched two gulls soar up and fly against the solid blue of the sky.

She was listening, and within a few moments her vigil had ended. She saw him coming over the rise of the sand hill . . . first, the tawny hair rising up like a flag, then the brows and eyes, and then the head, which for a fraction of a second appeared like a candy apple on a stick—then the wide shoulders, and at last, the entire figure was in view.

For a moment longer Marcia Ann watched his long, brown legs approach her, secretly giggling at his slow, dreamy pace, then she scrambled to her feet and waved to him.

"Hi, Dave!" she called. "I win this morning!"

Dave shrugged his shoulders half-heartedly, but he didn't answer until he came level with her.

"Who cares, anyway, Beanpole!" he said.

He started to sink to the waiting beach towel when Marcia teasingly pushed him.

"Shoo!" she exclaimed. "No crabs allowed in this vicinity!"

They both tumbled in the soft, white sand. Marcia rose onto her knees, and perching back on her heels, she watched Dave brush the sand from his arms. She laughed mischievously.

"Cut it now, Marcia," he said impatiently, "Honestly, you can be so childish!"

He stretched out the full length of the towel and rested his head back on his folded arms.

They were quiet for a while. Marcia watched his half-closed eyes staring upward in a dreamy examination of the sky.

The morning breeze was still cool and wafted about several strands of hair that escaped the pony-tail she wore. For the hundredth time, Marcia considered the prospect of having it cut into an 'Italian' like all the other girls at the resort. Then, leaving the thought unsettled, her mind leaped to the more pressing problem.

"I won't be a 'beanpole' much longer," she reflected out loud. "I've already gained two pounds this summer!"

"Well, hurrah and Yankee Doodle!" Dave exclaimed. Rolling over to his side he gave her a look of mock scrutiny. "And where are they, may I ask? Between your ears?" Then falling back with laughter, he chirped, "Hi, Miss Fathead!"

Marcia's pony-tail went flying as she flopped down in anger. "Don't think you're any Sampson yourself!" she retorted. "And besides, you've got so many freckles you look like a sand pile!"

"Look at Brainy here," Dave chortled, "making with the metaphor!"

"So what!" Marcia replied, haughtily. "It happens to be the truth!"

She giggled as she saw Dave's frown. She knew how much he secretly despised having them. When he didn't answer she felt happier.

She lay back now, too. Boys could be so utterly exasperating, she thought. Especially Dave, always teasing and saying such silly, brotherly things when he wasn't her brother at all. That's what happens when you practically grow up with a boy. You get so used to each other there's nothing special or romantic . . . and simply no appreciation. She felt she might as well be an old shoe for all the attention he paid her.

A short while later some of their friends arrived. Waving to each other and spreading out their towels, they formed separate little groups. Among them were Ronald and Sue. Both were a year older than Marcia, and of the entire group the only two going really "steady."

Marcia stared enviously at Sue in her beautiful red swimming suit. She looked just super and had a sophisticated way of tossing her head so that the short black cap of hair would flutter and glisten. But most of all, Marcia envied Sue because of Ronald. He was about the dreamiest boy, ever! Marcia sighed as she gazed at him. He was as good looking as any movie star. Maybe more so. Sprawled out on the beach, he cut a manly figure, and the way he smiled at Sue and her smiling back, was just something wonderful to behold. It was simply rapturous! All summer long Marcia had been waiting for Ronald to just look her way and smile, but with Dave always around, it just never did happen. Of course, it was fun being with Dave. He had taught her how to swim and watch for crabs and silly things like seeing who would beat whom down to the beach each morning.

"Golly, I can't wait to be seventeen!" Marcia suddenly exclaimed.

"Hey, Beanpole, you know something?" Dave responded. "That's exactly what I've been thinking about."

"Really?" Marcia cautiously inquired. "Or are you teasing me again?"

"No, honest. I can't wait until I get out of this "in-between" age. So somebody will take my ideas seriously for once." Dave turned over on his stomach so he could look straight at Marcia Ann. "Parents just don't realize that kids aren't juvenile forever!"

"I know what you mean," Marcia sighed. "I get it all the time, too. 'Gracious, Marcia!' " she imitated with an exaggerated inflection of her mother's voice. " 'Where did you learn your manners? Reading again at the table? Did you straighten up your room? Why don't you do something about your hair?" Marcia fell back to her natural tone. "Just honestly, it's always something — like I was a two-year old."

"My mother's pretty much the same," Dave confided. "No kidding. And even worse, when I speak to my Dad about wanting to go into rocket ship engineering, he practically falls off his chair laughing. He sure hasn't any adventurous spirit! That's all I can say!"

He shook his head, sadly, and for a while they silently reflected their spoken words. It was real nice to be talking so pleasantly for once, Marcia decided . . . A sudden and complete understanding of their innermost feelings.

Dave also seemed to be as deeply moved. He was staring again, but more intently now, his brow furrowed, as though pondering a subject of the utmost importance.

Slowly, he turned. "What did your mother mean about doing something to your hair?" he asked. "Nothing wrong with it that I can see."

"Why, thank you," Marcia gasped, unbelievingly.

"In fact, I like it," Dave added. He studied her with squinted eyes. "It's long and bouncy and distinctive. Why, even three blocks away I can tell you're my girl and not just anyone."

Marcia gasped. She had never thought of it that way before. "Dave's girl," she reflected and repeated it over and over again. Strange how suddenly it sounded so very important — being Dave's girl!

"Golly," she sighed, "I just never thought you noticed! Mother wanted to have it cut for summer."

"Cut!" Dave shouted. "Look, Beanpole, that would be an utter calamity! Absolute devastation, no less!"

Marcia had to laugh, quietly, It was such a nice feeling knowing how concerned Dave really was about her.

"I wouldn't dream of cutting it . . . if that's how you feel," she told him.

"Well, that's just how I do feel," Dave replied, emphatically. He smiled, and laying back he took her hand in his.

It was the most precious moment of her life, Marcia knew. It had come without warning, and remembering Sue and Ronald she knew she would never again be envious. It was far too wonderful just being herself.
